WASHINGTON — Secretary Stanley K. Hathaway has notified Trust Territory officials that nothing will be done to separate the government of the Northern Marianas from the rest of Micronesia before the U.S. Congress acts on the proposed commonwealth agreement that the Marianas approved 10 days ago.

namely that capital from Saipan's full separate administration of the Marianas would occur upon acceptance of the covenant in separation, is due to start right after Congress' anticipated approval of the agreement. Other views of the pact hold that nothing will really change until about 1981, and certainly not until the United Nations has approved the terms under which the Trust Territory has the issuance of a secretarial order providing for a full negotiation with its trustee, the United States. Those negotiations have been moving gradually toward consideration of the covenant, with the Marianas, which would set up their own commonwealth, something called "free association" between the U.S. government as part of the U.S. territories. The family of territories, the remaining districts of Micronesia: Truk, Palau, Ponape, and the Marshalls, would continue under the Trust Territory arrangement, but would have to relocate their $1.5 million in transition money.

Hathaway said that, upon approval of the covenant by the U.S. Congress, he will issue a new secretarial order providing for the separate administration of the Marianas District. This order would be based, he said, in large part on the final report of an "ad hoc committee" headed by Peter Coleman, deputy high commissioner of the Trust Territory, that is in charge of planning the transition.
